● ABOUT ME

Currently I am a PhD student under the tutelage of The Faculty of Foreign Languages and Literatures. Both my present academic endeavors and my past ones are largely based upon English Linguistics, path which has greatly contributed to acquiring a very good command of the language and to fostering a candid passion for this field. From a professional standpoint, I have been working as an EFL teacher for four years now, gaining experience not only with young learners, but also with advanced learners of the language. Taking into consideration my academic background, I do have to admit that I derive the greatest pleasure from working with advanced learners as I believe this level enables me to better convey my passion for the language. However, I am always open to new opportunities and experiences and I am of the opinion that the ideal workplace is one which helps you constantly evolve. In terms of research, it is primarily centered on the syntax and semantics of definiteness from a cross-linguistic perspective, encompassing both articlefull and articleless languages. To date, I have presented work on this topic at several conferences.
